Company Law Important Cases (Part 1): Separate Legal Entity and Corporate Personality

Hanspal Bakul · 14 Aug 2026

Introduction

When a company is registered under law, something rather remarkable happens. A new “person” is born – not of flesh and blood, but of legal fiction. This is what we call the doctrine of Separate Legal Entity. It means the company, once incorporated, has its own identity, distinct from the people who own it, manage it, or work for it.

The doctrine has its roots in English common law and was cemented by a landmark House of Lords decision that forever changed the way we understand corporate personality. Before this ruling, courts often blurred the line between a company and its members.

Today, this principle is the very foundation of company law. It explains why a company can sue and be sued, own property, and enter contracts – all in its own name. For any CLAT PG aspirant, understanding this doctrine isn't optional. It's the gateway to everything else in corporate law.

Salomon v. A. Salomon & Co. Ltd. [1896] UKHL 1

Facts of the Case

Mr Aron Salomon ran a successful boot and leather business as a sole proprietor. He later converted it into a limited company, following the required legal formalities. He held the majority of shares, while his family members held the rest – just enough to satisfy the minimum membership requirement of the time.

Salomon also lent money to his own company and, in return, secured debentures, making him a secured creditor. When the company eventually ran into financial trouble and was wound up, the unsecured creditors argued that Salomon and the company were essentially the same entity, and that he shouldn't be allowed to claim priority over them as a secured creditor.

Issue

Whether a company, upon due incorporation, acquires a legal personality distinct and separate from its shareholders, notwithstanding that one individual holds the overwhelming majority of shares and exercises complete control over its affairs.

Judgement

The House of Lords held that the company was validly incorporated. Once incorporation formalities are complete, the company becomes a separate legal entity, regardless of how much control one individual exercises over it. The court upheld Salomon's status as a secured creditor. A company, once incorporated, is a distinct legal person, separate from its shareholders – even if one person holds nearly all the shares and controls the entire business.

This is the foundational case of company law. Every student must remember it as the origin point of the "corporate veil" – the idea that the company stands as a shield between itself and its members.

Lee v. Lee's Air Farming Ltd. [1961] UKPC 33

Facts of the Case

Mr Lee formed a company for aerial crop-spraying and held almost all its shares. He was also appointed as the company's chief pilot and worked under a contract of employment with it. Tragically, he died in a flying accident while carrying out his duties for the company.

His widow sought compensation under workmen's compensation legislation, claiming her husband had died as an employee of the company. The insurance company opposed this, arguing that Lee, being the company's controlling shareholder and effectively running the show himself, could not also be treated as its employee.

Issue

Whether a person who is the controlling shareholder and sole governing director of a company can, in law, simultaneously stand in the position of an employee of that company for a workmen's compensation claim?

Judgement

The Privy Council ruled in favour of Mrs Lee. The company, being a separate legal person, was capable of entering into a valid contract of employment with Lee, despite him being its director and controlling shareholder. A company can enter into legally binding contracts, including employment contracts, with the very person who controls it, because the company exists as a person independent of its controller.

This case extends Salomon's logic one step further – separate personality isn't just symbolic, it has real, practical consequences, even in relationships between a company and the individual running it.

Macaura v. Northern Assurance Co. Ltd. [1925] AC 619

Facts of the Case

Macaura owned a timber estate, which he later sold to a company in exchange for shares – making him practically the sole shareholder. He continued to insure the timber, but the insurance policies remained in his own personal name, not the company's. When a fire destroyed the timber, he filed an insurance claim.

Issue

Whether a shareholder, notwithstanding his status as majority or sole shareholder of a company, possesses an insurable interest in property that is legally owned by the company, such as to sustain a claim under a policy of insurance taken out in his personal name?

Judgement

The House of Lords rejected his claim. Since the timber belonged to the company and not to Macaura personally, he had no insurable interest in it, regardless of his shareholding. Shareholders have no direct legal or equitable interest in the property of the company. Company assets belong to the company alone – shareholders only hold rights against the company, not over its assets.

This case draws a sharp line between ownership of shares and ownership of company property – a distinction that trips up students constantly, and one examiners love to test.

Indian Position: Bacha F. Guzdar v. Commissioner of Income Tax 1955 AIR 740

Facts of the Case

Bacha F. Guzdar was a shareholder in a tea company. Under Rule 24, Income Tax Rules, 1922, 60% of agricultural income was exempt from tax. Since the company derived a portion of its income from agricultural operations (tea cultivation), Guzdar argued that the dividend she received should also be treated as agricultural income and hence be tax-exempt in her hands.

Issue

Whether dividend income received by a shareholder from a company can be characterised, in the shareholder's hands, as agricultural income by virtue of the fact that a portion of the company's own income is derived from agricultural operations, so as to attract exemption under Rule 24 of the Income Tax Rules, 1922?

Judgement

The Supreme Court of India held against Guzdar. It ruled that dividend income is a distinct source of income for the shareholder, separate from the company's agricultural income. The character of income does not pass through to the shareholder simply because of share ownership.A shareholder does not have any legal interest in the assets or income of the company. Shares merely confer a right to participate in profits through dividends – they do not make the shareholder a co-owner of company property or income.

This is the Indian judiciary's clearest reaffirmation of Macaura's logic – proof that the doctrine of separate legal personality is deeply embedded in Indian company law too, not just an English import.

SEPARATE LEGAL ENTITY & CORPORATE PERSONALITY

LANDMARK CASES THAT SHAPED COMPANY LAW

INTRODUCTION

When a company is registered under law, something rather remarkable happens. A new "person" is born – not of flesh and blood, but of legal fiction.

- The doctrine of Separate Legal Entity gives the company a distinct identity, separate from its owners, managers or employees.
- It has its roots in English common law and was cemented by landmark judgments.
- This doctrine is the foundation of company law – it explains why a company can sue and be sued, own property, enter contracts – all in its own name.

For any CLAT PG aspirant, this is the gateway to everything else in corporate law.

WHY IS THIS DOCTRINE IMPORTANT?

Protects members from personal liability

Company can enter into contracts in its own name

Company can own property in its own name

Company can sue and be sued

THE LANDMARK CASES

1 SALOMON v. A. SALOMON & CO. LTD. [1896] UKHL 1

The case that gave birth to the doctrine of separate legal entity.

FACTS
Mr Aron Salomon converted his sole proprietorship business into a company. He held majority shares and lent money to the company, taking debentures as security. On liquidation, unsecured creditors argued he was not a separate entity.

ISSUE
Was the company a separate legal entity or merely Salomon's alter ego?

DECISION
The House of Lords held that the company was validly incorporated and a separate legal entity. Salomon's claim as secured creditor was upheld.

RATIO DECIDENDI
Once a company is incorporated, it becomes a distinct legal person, separate from its shareholders, even if one person holds nearly all the shares and controls the entire business.

KEY TAKEAWAY:
The corporate veil is born – the cornerstone of company law.

2 LEE v. LEE'S AIR FARMING LTD. [1961] UKPC 33

A company can even be the employer of its own controller.

FACTS
Mr Lee formed a company for aerial crop-spraying, owned almost all the shares, and was also its chief pilot under a contract of employment. He died in a flying accident while working for the company. His widow claimed workmen's compensation.

ISSUE
Could Lee, the controlling shareholder, also be treated as the company's employee?

DECISION
The Privy Council ruled in favour of Mrs Lee. The company could enter into a valid contract of employment with Lee.

RATIO DECIDENDI
A company, being a separate legal person, can enter into legally binding contracts, including employment contracts, with the very person who controls it.

KEY TAKEAWAY:
Separate personality has real and practical consequences in law.

3 MACAURA v. NORTHERN ASSURANCE CO. LTD. [1925] AC 619

Company property belongs to the company – not to its shareholders.

FACTS
Macaura sold his timber estate to a company in exchange for shares, making him the sole shareholder. He insured the timber in his own name. When it was destroyed by fire, he claimed insurance.

ISSUE
Could Macaura claim insurance for property that belonged to the company, simply because he was its major shareholder?

DECISION
The House of Lords rejected his claim. The timber belonged to the company, not to Macaura personally.

RATIO DECIDENDI
Shareholders have no direct legal or equitable interest in the property of the company. Company assets belong to the company alone, not to the shareholders.

KEY TAKEAWAY:
Ownership of shares ≠ Ownership of company property.

4 BACHA F. GUZDAR v. COMMISSIONER OF INCOME TAX 1955 AIR 740 (SC)

The Indian Supreme Court reaffirms the doctrine.

FACTS
Guzdar was a shareholder in a tea company. Since the company earned agricultural income (tea cultivation), she argued that the dividend she received should be treated as agricultural income and thus exempt from tax.

ISSUE
Could dividend income be treated as agricultural income merely because it originated from the company's agricultural activities?

DECISION
The Supreme Court held against Guzdar. Dividend income is a distinct source of income for the shareholder and does not inherit the character of the company's income.

RATIO DECIDENDI
A shareholder has no legal interest in the assets or income of the company. Shares confer only a right to participate in profits through dividends – not ownership of company property.

KEY TAKEAWAY:
Indian law fully embraces the principle of separate legal personality.

These cases together build the invisible shield around every company – a shield that gives it life, rights, and responsibilities of its own.
