Passage 1 (P.1)

The legal framework governing forest rights in India recognises that many forest-dwelling communities have traditionally depended on forest resources for their livelihood and cultural practices. Historically, however, colonial and post-colonial forest policies often treated forests primarily as state property, leading to restrictions on the activities of local communities. To address this historical imbalance, legislation was introduced to recognise the rights of forest-dwelling Scheduled Tribes and other traditional forest residents.

The law allows such communities to claim certain rights over forest land and resources, including habitation, cultivation for livelihood, and access to minor forest produce. Importantly, the framework also emphasises the role of local self-governance institutions in determining and verifying such claims. At the same time, the law attempts to balance community rights with environmental conservation, recognising that forests are ecologically sensitive areas. Thus, the legislation seeks to correct historical injustice while ensuring that forest governance incorporates both conservation goals and community participation.

Modern economies require an efficient system for resolving situations where individuals or companies are unable to repay their debts. Without such a system, financial disputes can remain unresolved for years, affecting creditors, employees, and the broader economy. To address this issue, India introduced a comprehensive insolvency and bankruptcy framework that consolidates earlier fragmented laws dealing with financial distress.

The legislation provides a structured process through which creditors may initiate proceedings when a debtor fails to meet repayment obligations. A central feature of the framework is a time-bound resolution process, during which a professional administrator may take control of the debtor's assets and attempt to reorganise the company or liquidate it if necessary. The law aims to maximise asset value and ensure fair distribution among creditors. The system also establishes specialised adjudicating authorities to oversee insolvency proceedings and ensure that disputes are resolved efficiently.

Passage 3 (P.3)

In many systems of governance, corruption or abuse of authority may remain hidden unless individuals within institutions are willing to disclose wrongdoing. Such individuals, commonly known as whistleblowers, expose illegal acts, corruption, or misuse of public power by reporting them to competent authorities. Recognising the importance of such disclosures, legal frameworks have been developed to provide protection to individuals who report wrongdoing in public offices.

These laws generally allow citizens or public servants to make complaints regarding corruption, misuse of power, or criminal offences committed by public officials. A key feature of such legislation is the protection of the identity of the person making the disclosure, as whistleblowers may otherwise face retaliation, harassment, or professional consequences.

At the same time, the framework aims to ensure that complaints are made responsibly and are not used for malicious or frivolous allegations. By protecting individuals who expose wrongdoing, the law attempts to strengthen transparency and accountability within public institutions.
