BLOGS

Doctrine of Separate Legal Entity: The Corporate Veil and Its Lifting

Khushi Malviya · 04 Jul 2025

Edit TABLE OF CONTENTS Introduction Salomon v. Salomon & Co Ltd The Concept of the Corporate Veil Lifting or Piercing the Corporate Veil The Effect of Lifting the Veil Conclusion

Introduction

The concept of a separate legal entity is a cornerstone of modern company law, providing a fundamental distinction between the company and its members. This principle, often encapsulated by the metaphor of the "corporate veil," grants a company rights and obligations distinct from those of the individuals who own or control it.

While this separation offers significant advantages, such as limited liability, it can also be exploited for improper purposes. Consequently, legal systems have developed mechanisms to disregard or "lift" the corporate veil in exceptional circumstances to prevent injustice or circumvent the law.

This post explores the genesis and implications of the separate legal entity principle, the nature of the corporate veil, and the various grounds upon which it may be lifted.

The Genesis of Separate Legal Personality: Salomon v. Salomon & Co Ltd

The principle of separate legal personality was definitively established in the landmark English case of Salomon v A Salomon & Co Ltd. Prior to this decision, there was some uncertainty regarding the legal status of registered companies, particularly those with a small number of members.

In Salomon, Mr. Aron Salomon, a leather merchant, incorporated his sole proprietorship business into a limited company. He, his wife, and five of his children held one share each. Mr. Salomon also sold his business to the company for a sum paid partly in cash, partly in shares, and partly in debentures (secured loans).

When the company subsequently failed, the unsecured creditors argued that the company was merely a fachada or agent for Mr. Salomon and that he should be personally liable for the company's debts.

The House of Lords, however, rejected this argument.

Lord Halsbury L.C. famously stated:

"It seems to me impossible to dispute that once the company is legally incorporated it must be treated like any other independent person with its rights and liabilities appropriate to itself, and that the motives of those who took part in the promotion of the company are absolutely irrelevant in discussing what those rights and liabilities are."

This decision firmly established that a registered company is a distinct legal person, separate and apart from its members, capable of owning property, entering into contracts, suing, and being sued in its own name. The implications of this principle are far-reaching, most notably in the area of limited liability.

The Concept of the Corporate Veil

The separate legal personality of a company gives rise to the concept of the "corporate veil."

This is a metaphorical barrier that separates the company from its members. It signifies that the liabilities and obligations of the company are not, as a general rule, the liabilities and obligations of the shareholders, directors, or other individuals connected with it. Similarly, the assets of the company belong to the company itself, not to its members.

The corporate veil provides significant advantages:

- Limited Liability: This is perhaps the most significant benefit. Shareholders are generally liable only up to the amount of their unpaid share capital. Their personal assets are protected from the company's creditors.
- Perpetual Succession: A company's existence is not dependent on the lives of its members. It continues to exist until it is formally wound up.

- Transferability of Shares: Ownership in a company can be easily transferred through the sale of shares, without affecting the company's operations.
- Ability to Hold Property: A company can own property in its own name, distinct from the personal property of its members.
- Capacity to Sue and Be Sued: A company can enforce its rights and be held accountable for its obligations in court.

These advantages have facilitated commerce and investment by reducing the personal risk associated with business ventures.

Lifting or Piercing the Corporate Veil

While the principle of separate legal personality is the norm, courts and legislatures have recognized that adhering strictly to this principle can, in certain exceptional circumstances, lead to injustice, fraud, or the circumvention of legal obligations.

In such situations, the "corporate veil" may be lifted or pierced, allowing courts to look beyond the company's separate legal identity and hold the individuals behind it liable or attribute the company's actions or property to its members.

It is crucial to understand that lifting the corporate veil is an exceptional remedy. Courts are generally reluctant to disregard the fundamental principle of separate legal personality and will only do so when there are compelling reasons.

The grounds for lifting the corporate veil are not exhaustively defined and have evolved through case law and statutory provisions in various jurisdictions. However, common grounds include:

1. Fraud or Improper Conduct

One of the most well-established grounds for lifting the veil is where the company is used as a vehicle for fraud or other improper conduct. If individuals use the corporate structure to perpetrate a fraud, evade existing obligations, or conceal their true intentions, courts may disregard the corporate entity to prevent them from benefiting from their wrongdoing. This can involve situations where a company is formed or used solely to shield individuals from liability for their fraudulent actions.

2. Evasion of Legal Obligations

Courts may lift the veil when a company is used to evade existing legal obligations or circumvent the law. This is distinct from merely using the corporate structure to reduce future liability, which is a legitimate use of the corporate form. This ground applies when a company is interposed specifically to defeat a contractual or statutory obligation that would otherwise apply to the individuals controlling the company.

3. Agency or Alter Ego

In some cases, courts may find that the company is not truly operating as an independent entity but is merely an agent or “alter ego” of its controlling members. This often arises in the context of closely held companies where there is a lack of distinction between the company’s affairs and the personal affairs of its controllers.

Factors considered include whether the company is adequately capitalized, whether corporate formalities are observed, and whether the company’s business is simply a continuation of the individual’s personal business.

However, merely being a wholly-owned subsidiary or being under the complete control of a single individual is generally not sufficient on its own to lift the veil on this ground; there must be an element of impropriety or injustice.

4. Group Enterprises

In the context of corporate groups, where a parent company controls several subsidiaries, courts have sometimes faced the question of whether to treat the group as a single economic unit rather than separate legal entities.

While the general rule is that each company in a group is a separate legal person, in certain circumstances, particularly where there is a high degree of integration and control, and treating them separately would lead to injustice, courts may be willing to look at the economic reality of the group.

However, this is a complex area, and courts remain hesitant to disregard the separate legal personality of subsidiaries merely because they are part of a larger group.

5. Statutory Provisions

Many jurisdictions have enacted statutory provisions that expressly permit the lifting of the corporate veil in specific circumstances. These provisions vary widely but often relate to areas such as:

- Tax Evasion
- Insolvent Trading
- Fraudulent Trading
- Employee Dues

These statutory grounds supplement the common law principles for lifting the veil.

The Effect of Lifting the Veil

When the corporate veil is lifted, the court effectively disregards the separate legal personality of the company for a specific purpose. The consequences vary depending on the grounds for lifting and the nature of the case.

It can result in:

- Holding individuals (e.g., directors or shareholders) personally liable for the company's debts or obligations.
- Attributing the company's actions or knowledge to its members.
- Treating the company's property as the property of its members for certain purposes.
- Preventing individuals from relying on the corporate structure to escape liability or evade the law.

It is important to note that lifting the veil does not dissolve the company; it merely suspends the application of the separate legal personality principle in the specific context of the case before the court.

Conclusion

The principle of separate legal personality, as established in Salomon v Salomon & Co Ltd, is a cornerstone of company law, providing a framework that facilitates business and investment through limited liability and other advantages.

The corporate veil is a metaphor for this separation. However, the law recognizes that this principle can be abused, and in exceptional circumstances, courts and legislatures are willing to lift the corporate veil to prevent fraud, injustice, or the circumvention of legal obligations.

The grounds for lifting the veil are not exhaustive and continue to evolve, reflecting a balance between upholding the fundamental principles of company law and ensuring fairness and preventing abuse of the corporate form.

While the threshold for lifting the veil is high, its existence serves as a crucial safeguard against those who would seek to exploit the corporate structure for illegitimate purposes.